Your knowledge and experiences

The reaction of police officers and nurses needs to follow a set procedure. Too often, they allow their biases to show on their face, in their body language and in the questions that are asked. The person approaching them ends up being interrogated and treated with suspicion. This resulted in me not seeking help even while hospitalized. First responders need to receive training to remedy this, and then have a point where they recognise that a referral needs to be made, and then have the process taken over by an experienced, postgraduate-level trained professional. While the referral is in progress, steps need to be taken to ensure the safety of all involved.
